

Liam Heary (wjh26a)

Tuesday, May 12th, 2026

Why I write-

I write because my in my head there is too much to keep track of, It isn't always a bad kind of messy, but it's a constant stream of processing, like having too many tabs open or a script running in the background that you forgot to kill. If I don't get it down on paper or into a doc, it just stays there, taking up memory. I write to clear the cache. I write because if a thought isn't documented, it feels like it never actually happened, or worse, like I'm going to lose the one idea that mattered among the thousand others that didn't.

I write to build a bridge. There's this massive gap between the abstract mess in my brain and the actual world where things get done. For me, writing is the only way to cross it. I'm not really trying to produce a masterpiece or some deep novel that's going to change the world. I'm just trying to turn a vague feeling or a complex logic problem into actionable information. I write to finish my thoughts too because half the time I don't even know im writing fully until I see the words hitting the paper, allowing me to formulate as I go along. It's like debugging my own consciousness.

I write because I've spent a lot of my life in environments where everything is measured, how fast you can move through water at 6:00 AM, how efficient your code is, and what benchmarks I hit in my personal life. In all that structure, writing is the one place where I can just be messy for a second. I journal to vent the pressure. I write to capture the things that don't fit into a spreadsheet or a technical manual. Sometimes I write to remember the way I felt in a happy situation or the specific frustration of a project that isn't working, not because it's useful, but because it's real.

I write to survive, everything moves so fast, especially when you're looking at the next semester, the next transfer, the next career move. Writing slows the clock down. It's a way of pinning a moment to the page, so it stops trailing on. I write to make sense of the noise, the politics of the world, the tech I want to build, the person I'm trying to become. I write because words are storable. They are a backup drive for myself.